lakes in this country, two on the Bhága and one on the Chandra near the Pálamo pass. This last is much the largest, being three quarters of a mile or more long. The water in all is fresh and very clear. In this vast region of alps and ice, it will be readily understood that habitable spots and cultivated fields are few and far between. They are found only in the lower valleys of the Chandra and Bhága, the remainder of the canton being desolate and completely uninhabited, save when, for a few weeks in summer, the Kúlu shepherds bring up their flocks for pasturage. The inhabited part of the Chandra valley is called by Láhaulis Rangloi, that of the Bhága, Gárá, and that of the Chandra-Bhága, Pattan.

The scenery in Láhaul is almost oppressive from its grandeur, and it is wild and desolate, for the villages and cultivated lands are mere specks on these vast mountain slopes. But there is something pretty and smiling about the near view of the villages, especially in Pattan and the lower part of Gárá. There is nothing striking in the flat-roofed two-storeyed houses, which are massed together in one or two blocks, so as to give in-door communication in winter; but the clumps of pollard willows standing in plots of smooth green turf, and the terraced fields neatly kept and waving with thick crops of wheat or barley, are pleasant to look at. On the banks of the fields and under the small canals are the dang or hay fields, in which the grass grows luxuriantly, mixed with bright flowers as in an English meadow, and here and there in bush or hedge are wild roses, bright crimson or bright yellow, and wild currant or gooseberry trees. Wherever water is brought, all this verdure springs up, but without irrigation the ground is so nearly barren that not only no crop will grow, but there is so little grass that at a short distance you would think there was no green thing on it. This description, however, does not apply to the upper villages in Gárá and the greater part of Rangloi; here there are few or no trees or bushes round the villages which have a very bleak look, but the grass grows thick and green on the hills without irrigation. In a few places the slopes immediately above the villages are thinly covered with kail (Pinus excelsa) or pencil cedar (Juniper excelsa) and higher up, here and there, there are patches of birch wood. Near the villages on the road-sides are long dykes or walls of stone from four to five feet high and a yard or more broad, on the top of which are placed slabs or round stones, on which the ommáni pádme hún and other Buddhist texts or mantras are inscribed. Chudhten or Dangten, which are curiously-shaped conical-buildings erected in honour of some saint or incarnation or as the mausoleum or relic temple of some lámá or great man, are found in the same situations. Above the villages, sometimes on the hillside and often under the shade or on the very face of a precipice, are seen the gonpas or monasteries of the lámás with flags flying and whitewashed walls. The average elevation of the cultivated and inhabited portion of Láhaul is estimated by General Cunningham at over 11,000 feet. Mr. Lyall, on the other hand, puts it at something less than 10,000. The highest villages are in the lower part of the valley of the Bhága, where one, named Kangser, is mentioned by Mr. Lyall at an elevation
